Why did the Provisional Government collapse?

The collapse of the Provisional Government was due to a combination of internal weaknesses and external pressures. The government was seen as weak and ineffective, lacking legitimacy and popular support. It was unable to address the economic, social, and political problems that were facing the country at the time, such as inflation, food shortages, and the continuation of the war. The Bolsheviks, who were gaining momentum, were able to present themselves as a more viable alternative, promising an end to the war and radical social change. The collapse of the government was also hastened by the Kornilov Affair, which damaged the government's credibility, and the Bolshevik seizure of power in October 1917. This marked the end of the Provisional Government, which had been in power for just over nine months.
